Fastest Century in Test Cricket

Brendon McCullum – 54 Balls (New Zealand vs Australia, 2016)

Test cricket is traditionally known for endurance and long innings, making fast centuries extremely rare. However, Brendon McCullum shattered conventions in his final Test match. Facing Australia in Christchurch, the former New Zealand captain smashed a sensational century off just 54 balls, the fastest in Test history.

McCullum's innings was filled with audacious shots, fearless intent, and pure power, perfectly symbolising the changing mindset of Test cricket.

Why it stands out:

Scoring at such a pace in the longest format, against a world-class bowling attack, makes this record truly extraordinary.

Fastest Century in One Day Internationals (ODIs)

AB de Villiers – 31 Balls (South Africa vs West Indies, 2015)

When talking about batting genius, AB de Villiers is in a league of his own. In 2015, he stunned the cricketing world by scoring an ODI century in just 31 balls, the fastest ever in the format.

Playing against West Indies, de Villiers unleashed a wide range of shots – scoops, pulls, reverse hits – leaving bowlers clueless. He eventually scored 149 runs, turning the match into a spectacle.

Why it stands out:

ODIs balance aggression with structure, making a 31-ball century almost unimaginable even in today's era.

Fastest Century in T20 Internationals

David Miller & Rohit Sharma – 35 Balls (Joint Record)

The shortest international format is built for explosive batting, yet scoring a century remains a major achievement. David Miller (South Africa) and Rohit Sharma (India) jointly hold the record for the fastest T20I century, both reaching the milestone in 35 balls.

Miller's knock showcased raw power, while Rohit's innings was a blend of elegance and brutal hitting – proving there's more than one way to dominate T20 cricket.

Why it stands out:

Even in T20Is, bowlers usually have the upper hand – making a 35-ball hundred an elite feat.

Fastest Centuries by Indian Cricketers

Indian batters have also left a strong mark on this elite list:

- Rohit Sharma – Fastest T20I century (35 balls)
- Virat Kohli – Among the quickest ODI centuries for India
- Yuvraj Singh – Known for explosive batting that changed limited-overs cricket

India's growing dominance in white-ball formats is closely linked to this attacking mindset.
